

In life, we fall short sometimes. That's just the humanity. With that being said, we all fell behind on our bills before. But it does not give a company the right to harass me night and day to try and collect. The more calls received by debt collectors, the more likely a person is liable to commit suicide, or fall into such a deep depression that they fall into an unhealthy mental state. You have some people that are so pressured by debt collectors that they go out and rob Paul to pay Simon. It's an unfair world. There must be a better way to attempt to collect such as attempting to collect via writing. Contacting someone on their cell phone is ridiculous because it doesn't change the financial situation of the debtor. What these companies need to understand is that if they continue to contact debtors on their cell, [WE] will eventually get the line disconnected or get our numbers changed. It's that simple. So stripping us of our rights will only hurt the companies more than help. We, the debtors, have the right to be protected by any means. We will hurt if the FCC bows to the industry's wishes and eviscerates the protections of the TCPA. TCPA is a consumer protection statute that the FCC is required to interpret for the benefit and protection of consumers.
